When the MailOnline website launched in 1999, its popularity was almost immediately undermined by some horrific examples of what the press should not do with online news. The first was a story about a mentally disturbed man who attacked commuters at Waterloo Station. Despite the fact that the site regularly published pictures of all sorts of horrific incidents – for instance, pictures of dead British servicemen and dead civilians in Iraq – there was outrage. The moral outrage was quite rightly directed at the MailOnline and, in the days that followed, MailOnline's editor at the time, Michael Scott-Railton, was briefly suspended. A year later, though, the website was heavily criticised when it ran a story which claimed that London had been flooded by poo in a £2.5m cleaning campaign. The Mail Online faced further controversy when it 82157476af
